Mulatte Assailant and His Cool Desperation-As Every-Day Experience Graphically Told by a Victim and a Sufferer.

It is not offer that I respond to an encore of any one of my articles, but the following sketch appeared in a paper of which I think not a single copy is now in existence, and I tautologize it today at the request of several triends, whose names I cannot at this moment recall. It was written away tack in the early days, before my name had become a household and barn-yard word. Here it is:

There were twelve men ahead of me the other day in the white barber shop where I have my features peeled and I was in a big hurry. In a moment of recklessness which will always foom like a specter in my holy past, I went into a colored shampoo joint on High street, and indicated by an expressive gesture that court was in ses-

My assailant was a young mulatto of about 22, with a breath eloquent of a recent "straight" and a wild attempt at a shirt that ought to have been staked off and surveyed by an engineer under the existing

On reflection, I believe that shirt was aimost untit for publication. There was a general air about it that betokened the alien to the laundry. An embrandt sketch in ambier ornamented the bosom, a breakfast egg was blooming like a memory on the left cuff, and the sleeves were more or less implicated in a scheme to look like a the left cuff, and the sleeves were more or less implicated in a scheme to look like a war map. There hung about the garment a vague and indescribable odor in which faded smells of "goose grease," bay-rum, perspiration and other sweets of a barber shop mingled in a bewitching bouquet that would have almost timed a grindstone, to say nothing of a stomach. I don't want to speak disrespectfully of this young hair-amputator, but he stood in need of a change of linen and a bath as many as several.

I threw myself in the chair, extended my legs so that my feet were lost in dim per-spective, laid back my head until the "Adam's apple" overlooked the nose, and told him to deal gently with the erring one. gentleman with the superhuman shirt. He said "yassah," and fished a fly out of the said "yassah," and fished a fly out of the hair-oil without looking at me. Then he torked a towel with an early history down my neck, tickled a piece of yellow soap in a bowl till it frothed, and then began to lather me with an abandon that ch ra terizes a small boy, a bucket of whitewash and eighteen yards of six-foot fence. He daubed it on to my features until it got up my nose and down into my throat. Finally I gurgied "time," and decided the round in his favor. I explained to him that I did not come in to get my palate shampooed, as he seemed to

As it was, he slapped lather upon that poor frail neck-fence until it was re-duced to a pulp, and clung to my neck for protection in a way that was pitisble. Still, the young man with the remote shirt, piled soap on my pale, high-bred face. I closed my eyes, muttered a prayer, thought of my past, and resolved to die like a man and a

A TEMPEST.

Dominic was a negro servant who had been a sailor the most part of his life; a constant use of sail provisions had given him the scurvy, in consequence of which he had lost his teeth. When he laughed it gave one the illusion of a black trouser leg torn at the knee. The comical effect was irresistible for the spectator, but threw a kind of ridicule on the masters of Dominic. He knew that his infirmity depreciated his value, and accordingly he worked for a moderate salary. For this reason Madame and Monsier Lahuche had hired him. After all they had a negro, and that flattered the vanity of ex-merchants and manufacturers of rice, macaroni, sago, etc., living in a country resi-dence, far away from the tempests of the world and vermicelli. They were there for the last two months caring to other voices but three-first, the one of the parot; second, the one full of bitterness of their female cook, ren-dered sad by the absence of any garrison; their soda fountain today, and disposed of third, the one of Dominic, the negro that over 3000 glasses of the moist goods.
